While starting the project was the reuse of five former textile mills in Czech Republic.

From an urbanistic point of view, the initial situation is remarkable: one site is situated next to the main square, two sites are situated on river banks below the historical city centre and two sites are situated on the outskirts of the city. The aim of the thesis was not to develop a final concept, but to illustrate several approaches of how the utilization of these sites can be supported and how it can be further developed. The thesis consists of a functional, a spatial and a technical approach.

This thesis deals with the design of a community centre on the Plaza de la Cebada in the centre of the Spanish capital Madrid. The existing high social capacities shall be used to create a place for people of all ages and social backgrounds. The function of the market should be preserved, while the typology of the market hall was put into question and alternative forms of trade were explored. The design emphasizes the revaluation of the public space and the reactivation of the zone. This shall be achieved particularly through active participation of the neighbours. The existing informal activities on the square are crucial to the design. The architecture backs off deliberately and offers room to the people for individual configuration.
