Two years later he founded a new office, All Design. Based in east London, All Design has completed several notable projects, including the Chips residential building in Manchester in 2009. In 2010, Alsop joined forces with London-based architects David Lyall and Alexander Störmer to form Alsop, Lyall and Störmer, which designed the North Greenwich Leisure Centre, a landmark in London's cultural scene.

In a 2015 interview with Dezeen, Alsop reflected on his career, saying, "Generally speaking in China – if you get the right client – they are very open and the possibilities of a project," Alsop said. "In the UK, the idea of risk has become a much greater issue. In China, you can have much more wide-ranging conversations about the possibilities of a project that are less risk-averse."

During his career, Alsop built The Public, an arts centre in West Bromwich, in 2008. But it closed in 2013. Alsop also completed a significant project in the UK, the Peckham Library, which was his greatest success. The library won the Stirling Prize in 2010, a prestigious award for the best new building in the UK.

Alsop "invigorated and energised" British architecture, according to Architects and Designers magazine. "He was always on the lookout for new ideas and new ways of thinking about architecture."

Will Alsop "was one of architecture's biggest characters and talents. He had an extraordinary ability to create buildings that were both beautiful and innovative."

The world of architecture is mourning the loss of a true visionary. Alsop's legacy will live on in the buildings he created and the ideas he inspired.
